NOTES TO THE CONDUCTOR

The composer of Serenade to a Cuckoo was a unique and brilliant talent. I suggest doing some research on Raasaan Roland Kirk and finding a video of one of his performances. The young musicians in your band have probably never seen someone playing two or three saxophones at the same time, not to mention the nose flute! This should help them understand a bit of the levity of this arrangement.

The figure in the trumpet parts at m. 5 is repeated throughout the piece and should be played in the same manner by the various instruments. It is the “cuckoo” of a cuckoo clock, with the first note staccato and the second note receiving the emphasis or accent.

Rather than directing the students playing wind instruments to “swing” the eighth notes, often resulting in a hokey dotted-eighth and sixteenth rhythm, have them play the eighths straight or even, but with a gentle emphasis on the “ands” of each beat. For example, in m. 10 and m. 14, observe the accent on the “and” of beats 1 and 2. Regarding articulation and attack, direct the players to use a “du” tongue, not a harsh “ta” tongue. This is a more appropriate attack for jazz musicians, especially the brass players, and will be a more successful method to get young players to phrase, articulate, and “swing.”

Notice mm. 40–42. The figure in m. 41 should be played very straight—no swing feel. This will have the effect of making it sound like the band is “laying back” and therefore not rushing the eighth notes. Use the same approach in m. 58. The rhythm section needs to go right back to an easy swing feel in m. 42. Rehearse this three-measure phrase repeatedly, until it feels comfortable.

During mm. 59–82, each section trades fours. This is a tradition in jazz in which soloists improvise four-measure phrases back and forth over the rhythm section. In this instance, each wind section is hinting at or “quoting” a snippet of a song somehow related to birds. You can make it a challenge to see if anyone in the band or the audience at a performance can recognize the songs. It will make everyone listen more!

Finally, make sure the band is super tight on the last two eighth notes, and that they phrase them “doo dit.”

Good luck and have fun!
